Price Just -

Just to many Doctors

"Doctors are fighting to maintain their income," stated Malcolm Brown, Health Economist at the University of Calgary, in a Forum on Health Care, featuring Monique Begin, National Minister of Health and Welfare.

Previous to 1966, 40% of new doctors were supplied through importation from other countries. The doctors maintained rigid control of numbers, through licensing procedures. A market place was maintained which was deficient in doctors, thus there were ample patients for all.

With the establishment of Medicare came a program to increase the number of doctors produced in Canada. Increasing the size of existing medical schools and creating new medical schools caused a growth of locally produced doctors from 900 in 1960 to 1,300 per year in the 70's.

The end result in the 80's is an oversupply of doctors. An increased supply of doctors has meant a decreased patient load for the individual doctor. The 1960's response to this trend was to "treat patients more intensely e.g. to invite them back, for an additional visit. In the late 70's, doctors had exhausted their capacity to treat people more intensely," informs Mr. Brown.

"Through Medicare, a fixed percentage of the national income is allocated to medical care. If prices increase with the cost of living, doctors incomes fall. Extra billing (by doctors) is an attempt to increase the percentage of national income spent on health care," notes Malcolm.

A complicating factor adds Mr. Brown is that, "as extra billing increases, patients are less likely to come back for the extra visit," hence the process begins to work against itself.

A member of the audience pointed out that oversupply of any item generally results in decreased price (profit). Why should doctors expect to be an exception? Though no one would answer directly, the responses clearly indicated it was because of the economic and political power of the doctors as a group.

Don Aitken of Friends of Medicare stated clearly that "Doctors want all the advantages of socialized medicine and none of the disadvantages of free enterprise."

Don adds, "Let's face it. Economic times are rough. Doctors should share in them with everybody else."

Monique Begin, National Minister of Health and Welfare (left) and Malcolm Brown, health economist at the University of Calgary (right) address the Annual Meeting of The Friends of Medicare.

A synthesis of the forum would state that it will take an active and vocal public to maintain a health care system. Without the pressure from the public, doctors will erode the medicare system through double billing. As the number of doctors increases, the amount double billed will increase.

Literacy Program at Alex Taylor School

As many as 17% of the population of Edmonton are 'functionally illiterate'. The Public School Board has established programs at Victoria Composite High School and Alex Taylor Schools in an attempt to begin to deal with the emensity of the problem.

Jean-Pierre Roy, who works with the program at Alex Taylor School emphasises that recruitment for the program is a major block. "Most people who can't read will attempt to cover this up. If someone comes to our program for a year and learns to read well, they won't tell anyone about it. They are unwilling to admit that they couldn't read." In English Language classes for immigrants, those who learn english are proud of it and tell all their friends. There are no problems advertising. It happens by word of mouth. Adult Literacy Classes are a different matter. "Those who cannot read will try to hide this instead of seeking resources."

Illiteracy is found in many sectors of society. Jean-Pierre tells of many individuals who hold supervisory positions in industry, who, for many years refused promotions because they feared someone would find out that they could not read.

Marjorie Staples another of the teachers in the program explains that they teach adults with a variety of backgrounds. Some have no knowledge of the written word. Not even the alphabet. Others can read but have a limited vocabulary. The students begin at whatever level their abilities place them. The program is geared to the individuals needs.

The program at Alex Taylor School is a day program with classes in the morning and afternoon. The program will run through the summer and students can start at any time. For information or to register call 420-6358.

Women in Dialogue - Women Together

Validation - not Negation

I excitedly pointed out to the service technician the problems I had discovered with the photo-copier, feeling competent and proud that I knew so much.

"This lid doesn't lie flush and unless its shut in a certain way, the machine doesn't work."

"Oh, no problem at all, he said, all you have to do is press this down and the light is activated."

"When the machine is cleaned, this rod sticks and requires force to be put back in place. I think the shaft or rod may be bent."

"Oh, no problem at all, all you have to do is give the rod a little twist just like this, see and it slides in smoothly."

"The plastic insert in the container that holds the used toner is crumpled and should be replaced."

"Oh, no big deal, some companies, you know, don't even use the plastic insert. However, I think I have some in the car." He never did replace the plastic insert.

As I walked away, I wondered why I felt so foolish, unimportant and put down - "no problem at all" - "no need to get so excited" was what I heard. I was very angry and humiliated in the way he had discounted the knowledge and the importance of what I had to say.

When in conflict, I seek out other people to work through the emotions, discover what exactly (what action) facilitated my response and to seek validation. Was this man really the cause of my anger and frustration or is he just one of many events that have culminated through the day? Four out of five people reassured me that my feelings were right on. They felt that it was very important to express what had happened, to this man, and how I had felt in the exchange. It would help me to feel better about myself, in support of other people in similar situations, and to enable this man to change.

I chose to meet with him alone, saving him the embarrassment of criticizing his behavior in public. I mentioned that although I didn't know him personally and would probably never see him again that I felt it was important to express my concerns.

"Just put yourself in my position. How would you feel if I responded to your concerns with "Oh, no problem at all ....." or "No big deal....." This machine is only two years old. Our agreement was that it be in working order. I should not have to compensate for its inadequacies by pressing a certain spot here, twisting a rod there, etc. That is your responsibility to see that is operating smoothly and efficiently."

He was very apologetic and said he had no intentions of hurting me. I believe that he was honest and really wasn't aware of how destructive the communication had been. There are good and there are better ways of relating to one another. A better response might be, "Yes, this is a problem and I'll look into it. Thanks for pointing it out to me."

This experience has taught me alot about myself. I realize that I feel inferior, inadequate, and insecure especially with respect to my intellectual skills. I, as a woman, have received numerous strokes or compliments about what a beautiful woman I am, that I give alot, love people and care for them. However, I receive little feedback about how smart I am, that I think through things and know much about the world. The world tends to view and slot men and women accordingly. Two friends of mine wore t-shirts that read:

This man is-	This woman is-
smart	kind
strong	loving
good-looking	caring
all of the above	all of the above

It is very important as men and women to work against these scriptic roles that we have been placed in.

Native Urban Health Worker

Darlene Willier, Urban Health Worker for the Alberta Indian Health Care Commission.

Darlene Willier, Urban Health Worker operating out of an office in the Nechi Centre, indicates that one of the major battles she fights is that Medical Services (of the Federal Government) often takes the cheapest route for her clients, rather than what they want for themselves.

Darlene's mandate is to ensure that native people in Edmonton receive all the health care services they are entitled to. She deals mostly with native people coming from rural areas and out of province, who are unfamiliar with the system and how it works.

Darlene arranges for Native people to receive medical treatment and other Health care. She arranges for the supply of prescribed prosthetics, drugs and medical supplies.

Her work ranges from the basics of helping a newcomer get Alberta Health Care to acting as an advocate when Medical Services are withheld.

Much of her function is making referrals and assisting clients in their passage through the bureaucracy and guidelines of Medical Services.

Any Native person needing assistance of information with respect to their Health Care needs should contact Darlene at 429-2447.
